RARE COLONIAL PORTRAITS ON VIEW

Van Cortlandt Mansion Reopened in Spirit by Faces of Early Days.

WASHINGTON'S OWN STUART

Andre Is There With His Sweetheart, Burr's Ill Fated Daughter and Others.

In the old Van Cortlandt mansion in Van Cortlandt Park a most interesting historical exhibition has been arranged by the Colonial Dames, which will prove of special interest to New Yorkers. The beautiful old mansion with its fine old colonial furniture is in itself a museum well worthy of study. The added interest is a valuable collection of miniatures, silhouettes and paintings loaned by old New York families.

Many of the best-known men in American history, such as Major Andre, Aaron Burr and others appear in their ancient frames. Some of the works of art on exhibition have themselves figured in events of history.

Rare "Stuart" Washington.

One of these is the George Washington portrait by Gilbert Stuart, which was loaned by its present owner, Mrs. William Graham Rice of Albany. It is a little known portrait, yet it once belonged to Washington himself and hung for years in his rooms at Mount Vernon. It gains greatly in authenticity as a portrait for that reason. There are so many versions of the Washington face in existence that vary greatly in features, it is evident that the one the general himself tolerated must have given satisfaction to him.

George Steptoe Washington, one of four nephews of the first President, and after that it was bequeathed to William Temple Washington, who lived near Rappahannock, Va. Finally, at the time of the civil war, fearing for his safety, when the national troops took possession of the place the owner placed the canvas between the carpet and the floor matting for protection.

Gen. Hancock, who occupied the room, often walked over it unwittingly. After his death it came into the possession of Washington's cousin, Richard D. Curtis of Washington, and was sold in 1868 to John V. L. Pruyn, whose daughter, Mrs. Rice, is the present owner.
